

How about another name? "Milk production." For this one we need two words. One to describe the act of penetrating another against their will, and the other for when a child is taken away from its mother. Care to guess? Yes, I know. "Rape and kidnapping." Terms we understand. Harsh words that more accurately convey the cruel and vicious acts carried out for that jug of white liquid in the container with the animated drawing of a smiling cow.

I'm assuming that by now everyone is aware that cows only produce milk as a result of pregnancy. It's a natural phenomenon that occurs in female mammals. It happened to our mothers and grandmothers and to every woman lucky enough to have had a child growing inside them. You see, nature has decided that this "milk," produced by mothers, is the best way to ensure the healthy development of a newborn. This beloved liquid, filled with vitamins and minerals, is designed to give the baby the best chance at survival.

Nature has also decided that this prized possession is only needed for a short time. When it ceases to flow, it signifies
